

Department of Conservation Statement of Service Performance (Output) Reporting detail of Species Management for the year ended 30 June 2014.

The information provided below lists the New Zealand native species that are classified in some way as threatened, and which had targets to proceed with work in the year 2013-14 (either active species management programmes or survey monitoring and research), with the intention of improving their security or improving our understanding of status and threats. The reasons why a small number of species did not have planned work undertaken is explained on pages 36-37 of the DOC Annual Report in the national commentary on variance.

The threat classification system has been updated for birds and plants - hence the 2008 At Risk and 2008 Threatened headings. For other taxa (mammals, reptiles, insects) the threat classification reflected here is the older one (acutely threatened, at risk, chronically threatened). The updated threat classification is included in the column to the right of the table. In future years the threat classification categories will be brought into line. The species that appear in these lists will change over time for various reasons; from the now updated classification system, from understanding the consequence of management actions, from further assessment of species status, from benefiting from the management of ecosystems where they occur (as part of managing priority ecosystems for ecological integrity), and from choices made on priorities for species to work on in any given year.

Information on the New Zealand threat classification system can be found on the DOC website <http://www.doc.govt.nz/publications/conservation/nz-threat-classification-system/>
